Dear BCSFA fen,
Happy New Year.

Well, I still have not figured out the software issue—the illo that I hope is on this page, is from FreeHand and cannot be brought directly into the software I use for loccing. So I can convert the image to a PDF (etc.) and bring that in, but for some reason all the detail is fuzzy. So, I type the text separately and then try to fit it onto the FreeHand page (the page that will be lost to me once I am forced to move on operating-system-wise). So, I am trying to use it while I can and while I try to find a workaround. That's an explanation—now on with the nuts and bolts (and hoping it works out!) (Well—it did not work quite the way I pictured it, but I think it is legible!—hm, on the monitor text typed in FH looks different—oh well can't sort that out now.)

Interesting...um...er...stamp (?) on the October ish. On the good ship Lollip...but you get the idea. As always, a pleasure to see Foster illos on the cover(s)!

[The stamp was to go with the pirate/nautical theme of VCON 38.]

For John Purcell—the snow is snowing and the wind is...yeah right season and all that.

Lloyd, keep searching the good search—with aspiration toward finding the perfect job!

The Helsinki bid piqued my interest. While things cyber are not technologically my forte, I tried to watch the video available online about the bid...and found the warning was correct—the audio was so bhad I couldn't get anything out of it. Ah, but I had high hopes and hope they will give it another go!

Now that Dale (Speirs) is retired, I sincerely hope there is a list of his books in the future. Reading Opuntia is always a treat. His explanations of various topics are understandable and interesting, his interests are widespread and I really hope his research and writings can coalesce into a “series of books”—granted over a tremendous range of topics, but interesting nonetheless!

Well, this does not seem to be very long, but since calendars take up a lot of the two issues I can easily locate, I feel a little better about such a poor response. I still, vainly, am looking for the 36–48 hour day. The stack o pencil sketches continues to grow as the time I can find to work on any one of them decreases—frustrating—very frustrating!

Now that this year's Hugo nomination season has opened, I expect to see a lot more comments about LonCon. There is not any chance that I could make the trip, but it is entertaining to read about the preparations so many others are making to get across the Pond. (Reminds me—all those who are Worldcon members—nominate! Fill in as many of the blanks as you can and spread the egoboo for other fen whose "work" you have enjoyed this past year. If you do and you still don't like the results, at least your did your part!)

Well, think I am as caught up as I can be without a ish-hunt—so I will start the year off in a more-or-less timely fashion!

Sheryl ☹

Hello again BCSFAns! I think I wished you all a Happy Valentine's day last time, so...I guess this time it's Happy Saint Patrick's Day? Never did like that one. Anything that encourages people to be loud and drunk in public is major negativo in my books.

I mean, with the fireworks you can just not go to the beach. On Green Beer Day, they are everywhere.

Re: Google's mysterious yellow tagged scanners. Do they at least give people a decent reason why they can't talk to them? Because if not, they are going to give out a serious "evil cult" vibe that just begs people to hatch wild conspiracy theories.

Secrets brew suspicion. And powerful organizations always turn evil when they no longer have the eyes of the world upon them.

I find the idea of small neighborhood fibre optic networks interesting, but I confess I am not nearly paranoid enough to find them practical. Cable modem and WiFi are fine by me. There is a lot of scary talk going around about spybots and whatnot, but the reality rarely lives up to the fear.

I do think that privacy as we have known it, total control over your informational footprint, is dying, both for the big and for the small.

We will all live in glass houses in the future, even the high and mighty. What will protect our information will be a kind of beneficial mutual fear. If I use your information against you, then you might use mine against me.

It's like a nudist colony. Everything is visible, but nobody looks.

Welcome to the Panopticon, folks. See you next month!

Hi Felicity,

I ran into some interesting lit on a site. Seems they want to try to promote new authors by offering a massive download.

<http://stupefyingstories.blogspot.co.uk/2014/01/announcing-2014-campbellian-anthology.html>

For the more activist types Tor.com is also a mirror site for this. I always liked John W. Campbell. He was a good writer and it made him a better editor. He was also an innovator as well as a mover and shaker of society. One of the earliest texts of Project Gutenberg was made by him and he was an amateur radio type as well. If there was a single person responsible for inspiring those who participated in the moon landings it had to have been Campbell.

I'll grant that the literature of Astounding/Analog suffered from the ordinary prejudices of the time but the heroics of the main characters stands in stark contrast to the pallid brown-nosing so common in today's popular versions of SF.

Struggle for the Galactic Empire (comp version) is now for sale at Decision Games. It was a struggle to playtest and it isn't for those with pre-conceived notions. It's hard to beat but it was a lot tougher without the added optional rules.

The long slog up Omaha Beach is still continuing but it's coming closer to completion. I'm hoping Decision is getting closer to redoing Battlefleet Mars which has been on the back burner for a long time.

Bitcoin is in the news again. Apparently if you understand the workings of its scheme, it is vulnerable to being hacked and as it is high-priced that makes it more attractive to such occurrences. Part of a simple explanation is that the software is math-based. Math problems are always simpler if you use easy-to-solve examples and the recent revelations of governments deliberately conspiring to force the use of more easily solved crypto places everything secured that way at risk.

Catch-22 is that you have to trust those systems, or transactions cease, but now all of them have to be examined and in some cases redone to remove government-introduced vulnerabilities. Removing your front door to make it easy for the government to see you have nothing to hide opens you to a lot of unwanted access by people who are not your friends.

On a brighter note CJ and Jane are having a get-together for people who hang out on their blogs in September, sort of a minicon for a small slice of fandom.

Libraries across Canada are opening makerspaces. This may be a portent of great things to come as the patents for 3D printing are starting to lapse. Having been in on the earlier comp wave I know that it is going to be fun to get involved in. I haven't been keeping up with wot i red on my hols this year but highly recommended if you haven't been aware of him.

Now I need to find you a few pictures.

Warm regards,

Dave Haren

Dear BCSFAns:

Many thanks for issue 488 of BCSFazine, and this letter is written as the warmer weather comes in, and gives Toronto a decent Vancouver fog. Time for comments to relay ASAP.

The Cameron Effect does indeed ripple through Canadian fandom, such as it is. I admit that while I do care, it may be getting more difficult to keep caring to the same extent. We may be simply deciding that while fandom may still be fun, continuing on with our usual expectations may be futile. We either overhaul those expectations, or we retire from the field, with our achievements intact, allowing newer fans to take over and run the show.

My LOC...Rob Ford's brother Doug, a councillor for the north end of Etobicoke, and about as bad as his brother the Mayor, has announced that he will not be running for councillor next election, and will not run provincially, either. He will be his brother's campaign manager, and the two Fords will continue to produce their YouTube show Ford Nation, where in their newest episode, they name ten fellow councillors who they will campaign against. The whole political process in this city is disgusting, moreso since the Fords arrived and were elected. Ick.

[At first I thought you meant that Ford was providing the nation with a figurative YouTube show, but I checked and he really has one: <http://www.youtube.com/user/officialfordnation/videos>! I watched a few episodes, and it's pretty sad.]

The VCON 39 Organizational Kickoff...how did that go? The idea of having this kind of launch as an open event is something most other conventions could learn from. Most conventions are closed shops at first glance, and many positions are filled by friends who are somehow induced to come and help out.

Hope everyone is supporting the BC Ren Festival folks as they raise more money to make the next Festival happen. Wish I could get to one of their steampunk events, but there's an awful lot of geography in the way. Way to go, Chris and Martin!

There's someone to have as a GOH at the upcoming VCON...Charlie McKee. He could talk about his early years with Bakka Books, and best of all, he's doing business in New Westminster these days. I remember Bakka on Queen St. W. well, especially with John Rose as the owner. I haven't been in the new Bakka very often.

Well, I think it's time to go. Zine is done, and the page is almost done, too. Gold for both women's hockey and curling today! Hope the men can do the same. See you with the next issue.

Yours,

Lloyd Penney

Notes from January 2014 BCSFA Meeting

In attendance were Graeme Cameron (president), Barb Dryer (secretary), Kathleen Moore (treasurer), Ray Seredin (host), Felicity Walker (editor), Michael “Fruvous” Bertrand, and Sidney Trim.

Barb said that the apartment building management is now charging us $25 per meeting for the use of rec room, instead of the previous $10. Kathleen and Barb pored over the building bylaws to see what our options were. Barb gave me strata council meeting minutes from “March 21, 2913” [sic] to keep on file. We all donated our own cash to pay for the room this month, but instead a WCSFA cheque was written and the cash was donated to the BCSFAzine finances envelope. Kathleen said that her treasurer’s opinion was that if the price of the room goes above $15 we should move.

Graeme reports that there is a $5/year membership fee for WCSFA (BCSFA is now part of WCSFA) but that if you paid to attend the last VCON you are automatically a member of WCSFA for the next year and have already paid for your membership, and if you join BCSFA without having been to VCON (or purchasing a membership for the next VCON) you become a member of WCSFA anyway, but without voting privileges at WCSFA meetings, so no money is owed WCSFA. BCSFA and WCSFA’s bank accounts will be combined under WCSFA’s name but will be kept as separate accounts. WCSFA has offered to pay for BCSFAzine (on receipt of formal request). Graeme said that he should be listed as Chair of the Social Committee of WCSFA rather than President of BCSFA to avoid confusion with the President of WCSFA. Kathleen would like to be listed as “Supporting Donor for BCSFAzine Production.”

Kathleen said that before March we need to discuss the huge postal rate hike. Ray and Fruvous added that Canada Post is ending home delivery! Fru added, “Because Steven Harper doesn’t understand that services are supposed to be there whether they make a profit or not.” Kathleen said that the dirty secret of the post office is that if they charged more for junk mail, they could get the needed money—and to determine what is “junk mail,” all they would have to do is add a surcharge on any mail without a postal code.

I’d e-mailed the December meeting notes to Graeme and Kathleen last night but also printed them out and brought them tonight in case they hadn’t had time to look at the e-mail version yet. Graeme said that he’d read the e-mail but had decided to tell me in person that the notes looked OK. I joked “Why waste a stamp!” Graeme remembered an urban legend that the government would make people buy “virtual stamps” to send e-mails.

minute, 99¢ each additional minute.
Kids, get your parents’ permission
before calling.”*

Graeme had been reading about North Korea. They sustain themselves with drug trading.<sup>5</sup> Their embassies have no budget—they have to pay for themselves by smuggling drugs in diplomatic bags. Back at home, the citizens appear to carry cell phones, but they can only be used for local calls.<sup>6</sup> They do have computers, but no access to the world Internet. Instead they use a government controlled national net service. Surprisingly, every North Korean can quote Gone with the Wind because it was Kim Jong Il’s favourite and therefore required reading. (I had also encountered this factoid in National Geographic.) Graeme said weird, peculiar dictatorships fascinate him. Another odd fact Graeme related is that the majority of refugees who have escaped North Korea have only done so for economic reasons, and still love their Leader and don’t blame him for anything. This shows the extent of their indoctrination, another example of which is that the the North Korean history books make no mention of the fact that South Korea would have defeated them if not for the intervention of China.

“Frankly, my dear,

I remembered reading a Destroyer (Remo Williams) paperback which went to great lengths to show that Chiun was a master martial artist by explaining that even the North Korean government and military are afraid of him, and that they’ve left his village of Sinanju alone even though it lies within their borders. Graeme replied that in real life the North Korean military is itself very dedicated to the martial arts, and has a division of 15,000 soldiers specializing in it.

Graeme added that in North Korea, foreign journalists are not told where they’re going and are all taken in separate vehicles. Ray said the Canadian government did the same thing during the Cold War when taking CBC journalists to the situation room just outside Ottawa.<sup>7</sup> It cost $300 million, and Ray thought it could still be used today so the money wouldn’t go to waste, except that (as Graeme pointed out) by now everyone knows where it is and how thick the the walls are (and so how much force to use to penetrate them).

Ray said something about Toronto-hating.<sup>8</sup> I joked that it was a popular Canadian tradition. Graeme said that now it’s becoming popular in Toronto! (They can’t let us have anything!)

Graeme told the story about his RCAF dad and fellow pilot buddies (in the midst of a wild, drunken party) plotting to hijack an American battleship and sail it up the Ottawa River to shell their own headquarters. It was clear that whatever image they might project in public, they were a wild and crazy group and had little use for authority. Ray remembered another prank in the military in which a new guy on an incoming plane was shown a boat in the water below and left to assume it was an invasion, and he should report it. He did, and got in big trouble. Another (?) guy had to shower later than the rest of the group, and so they told the female personnel to assemble outside the shower at the time the guy would be showering, and they pulled the fire alarm.

That reminded me of an interview with Burt Ward I'd recently seen on YouTube.<sup>9</sup> Ward claimed that while making Batman (1966) Adam West was jealous of Robin's popularity with the younger fans and would always look for opportunities to upstage Ward or otherwise remind him who was playing the title character. According to Ward, West would never explain his sabotage of Ward's screen time except to shrug and say "Sorry, Burt, I had to do it." So, once when Ward and West had two dates with two sets of girls in two hotel rooms (across the hall from each other), Ward locked West out of the room and left him in the hallway naked, saying "Sorry, Adam, I had to do it."<sup>10</sup> West remembers it differently, and Graeme also had his doubts as to who was the real jerk, based on Ward's behaviour at Fan Expo a few years back, where he ignored the line of fans waiting for his autograph and texted on his cell phone, while West was happy to meet his fans.

Graeme reiterated that he hates pranks, as a rule. Some are harmless and some will humiliate the victim for life. This reminded me of the advice in How to Win Friends and Influence People (1936) about scoring coolness points by making fun of someone: the people you impress with your zinger will forget about it immediately, but your victim will remember it forever and find a way to get back at you.

My notes say that Graeme replied "Now I'm in charge of the big red button!" Graeme added that Russia is another place where it's not just that the system is corrupt; the corruption is the system (and it's even worse than we thought). Which explains why Putin's private worth is estimated at $5.9 billion!

So far IKEA is the only business to refuse to pay the standard bribes—for example, the safety inspectors might say that you need 300 permits to build your store, and the permits cost $1 million each. The Russian authorities also insisted that IKEA spend their own money to build the bridges and roads in Moscow that their shopping centre needed. As this does not fall under IKEA's firm policy of not paying bribes, they built the bridges and roads.<sup>11</sup> I'd read in National Geographic and elsewhere that in parts of the world, bribes are a standard part of business. (This was also the plot of the Yes, Minister episode "The Moral Dimension"—obtaining export contracts by bribery is "not government policy; just government practice.")

Someone asked, "What else bugs Vladimir Putin?" and I replied "Shirts?" Graeme said that President Putin (and Russian culture in general) is 1950s-macho. I wondered if that was why Putin was anti-gay—as per Fruvous’s theory that if you go far enough into macho, it starts to seem gay. As examples of Putin’s homophobia, Graeme remembered Putin saying “those Islamic terrorists were all gay” and that gays should “leave the children alone.” Graeme added that Putin has started a youth movement of thugs numbering 100,000 that he buses in to break up protests. I said it sounded like a modern-day Sturmabteilung.<sup>12</sup> Graeme said that Putin also has a more legitimate youth movement that does boy-scout stuff (which would presumably be the Hitlerjugend in the analogy).

Graeme went on to say that Russia is currently oil-rich, and Europe was happy to buy from them until the winter that Putin cut off the natural gas and people died. According to what Graeme had read Putin is a master of the KGB art of mingling—reflecting the views of whomever he’s talking to, to get them lower their guard. Also, when Chancellor Angela Merkel visited, her team warned Putin in advance that she had a dog phobia<sup>13</sup> and there should be no dogs present, yet he deliberately led her through a door guarded by a huge mastiff.<sup>14</sup>

Graeme said that Putin thinks the US media is owned by the rich and the government,<sup>15</sup> and wanted to bribe the New York Times to stop harassing him. Fruvous said that the test of a mature civilization is when someone can say something that makes you mad and you accept that you can’t do anything to punish them.

Fru added that in Kurt Vonnegut’s The Sirens of Titan (1959), a character creates a Martian invasion (which are just humans with rifles, trained on Mars) in order to unite Earth. This same well-intentioned false-flag gambit subsequently appeared in the Outer Limits episode “The Architects of Fear” (1963) which was mentioned in (and may have inspired) Watchmen (1986). Around the same time as Watchmen, and much more surprisingly, then-President Ronald Reagan said to the UN, “Maybe we need some kind of universal external threat. I sometimes think how quickly our differences worldwide would vanish if we were faced with an alien threat from outside this world”! Graeme and Fruvous said that the aliens would have to be so scary that there was no hope that one side or another could make a deal with them and screw the other side.

Sid said, “Maybe the War of the Worlds aliens are the Footfall aliens!” Graeme said that HG Wells, who was upset by recent British invasions of African nations, intended War of the Worlds to be a metaphor to teach England what it would be like to be invaded by a superior force; people didn’t get the message, and just thought it was a ripping good yarn.

Perhaps considering whether an external threat would get us motivated, Fruvous wondered when the commercialization of space would really begin. Sid said that space travel was an example of a technology that arrived too early to be accepted in its own time. He gave other examples: there have been flatscreens since the 1960s, but they weren't mass-produced until the USAF needed them in their planes; DEC had early PCs but didn't think there was a market for home computers. I said that Kodak researchers made a digital camera in 1985 but it was rejected since everyone still preferred film (or so Kodak thought). Fruvous added the internal combustion engine, which had been conceived much earlier but only came into modern use with large-scale oil production.

*I'm in the Blāk Lodge with...

Kathleen brought President's Choice chocolate. It was labelled "Decadent" so as to suggest that it would taste like their Decadent line of cookies.<sup>16</sup> It reminded me of a YouTube video I'd recently seen of Anderson Cooper trying Coca-Cola Blāk,<sup>17</sup> a coffee-flavoured Coke from the mid-2000s. Cooper did not like it. I wondered if it was because he had and the beverage had fundamentally opposing pigmentations. Cooper is practically bioluminescent. Fruvous said Cooper seems almost too good for this world, and I said that Cooper is like a beautiful elf version of Seth Meyers. Fruvous agreed and said that Cooper and Meyers are like Arnold Schwarzenegger and Danny DeVito in Twins (1988). I replied, "Or Cooper is Meyers wearing faery glamour." Fru imagined Cooper twirling around to transform and I said "360°!"

Sid said, "You guys must have been watching Wonder Woman (1975) reruns on KVOS, which only shows 40-year-old shows." I replied that I wished Teletoon Retro was that conscientious about what they consider "retro." Fruvous and I agreed that a show on Teletoon Retro should be at least 20 years old (and if it were up to me, nothing newer than 1994).

Relatedly, Graeme had been reading a book about growing up in Britain in the 1950s—as you'd expect, postwar Britain was bleak (people were lucky if they even owned a bathtub<sup>18</sup>)—but on the plus side the book also talks about TV. Sid said that some US shows did air in Britain back then, but the BBC was into social engineering: there was no rock and roll allowed, hence pirate radio stations, and you can still see pirate radio references in old British shows, such as Thunderbirds (1964)!

Graeme is annoyed by the editing style of current documentaries—the music is frequently too loud to hear the narration, the people talk in generalities without explaining the stock photos or footage being shown, and all too often the editing is like a flash card session which doesn't give you enough time to focus on what you're looking at. Fru said it sounds like they've found a way to get even cheaper than the documentaries that consist of stock footage, talking heads, and slowly-moving photographs. I have similar objections to modern documentaries, which too often start with the director explaining what the subject of the documentary means to him personally, as though he were the subject, and which consist far too much of present-day talking heads and not enough of content from the actual period being documented. (Even a reenactment would be an improvement over someone sitting in a chair in a black room.) Graeme, Fruvous, and I agreed that old documentaries are better. Fruvous said that old BBC documentaries are made for people who are interested, and they're like an educational course, but fun.

18 I saw a pretentious short film at an animation festival once, in which the narrator, speaking of his bleak 1950s British upbringing, glumly intoned "My brother and I had to share the bath. One time he did a poo," causing me to snicker quietly during the closing credits, which made my friend sitting next to me laugh in huge, uncontrollable gasps, causing several other patrons turn to glare at us.

Ray said that Memory Express now sells TARDIS-shaped routers. Fruvous replied that he's seen photos of a TARDIS fridge online. Ray added that the Doctor is getting a new "Bessie" (the Third Doctor's yellow antique roadster). Someone asked if it would be able to talk. Sid added, "Like KITT." Ray said that today, a blue police box would be out of place, even in London. He said, "And if a Victorian woman were to walk out..." and I replied, "People would probably assume she was a steampunk cosplayer."

Stewart Smyth phoned to say that didn't feel well enough to attend. We all shouted "Happy birthday!" to him over the phone. Joe Devoy was also absent due to illness. Fruvous said "There's something going around," which reminded me of the Old Navy cargo pants commercial from ten years ago, where vocalists sing "Cargo Fever! You've got to boogie down!" to the tune of "Boogie Fever" by the Sylvers (1975), after which a DJ (Shemar Moore) says "I think it's going around" in a way that someone I knew back then found very smug and irritating. Fruvous said a funny article would be "The History of Pants As Seen Through Old Navy Ads." I wondered what had happened to the 1990s Old Navy spokeslady with the big eyeglasses and the dog.<sup>19</sup>

A few days ago Amos Iu had asked me what month/year BCSFAzine #1 was published, so I relayed the question to Graeme. He said he didn't know off-hand, but could find out, although no-one has a copy of the first issue (which was on one sheet).<sup>20</sup>

Kathleen said that the Weird Food of the Month Award goes to Goldfish Vanilla Cupcake Graham Crackers.

Harold Ramis, 1944–2014

Harold Ramis, American director, writer and actor, died today, aged 69. Most famous for playing Dr. Egon Spengler in Ghostbusters (1984) and its 1989 sequel, both of which he co-wrote with Dan Ackroyd (the long-mooted third instalment is now unlikely ever to emerge from pre-production hell). His other screenplays include Groundhog Day (1993) and the 2000 remake of Bedazzled, both of which he also directed, whilst his vocal talents featured in Heavy Metal (1981) and Spacehunter: Adventures in the Forbidden Zone (1983).

VCON 38 Con Report: Day 1

Michael Bertrand

Friday 4 October 2013

Note: This year's convention theme was "pirates."

2 PM: Jolly Joe Devoy, Ruthless Julian Castle, and I depart from our home port of Seafair on the Isle of Lulu for the nearby port of Sea Island, to partake of a three day grapple with fellow buccaneers. Our hold is laden with provisions for the trip, and we look forward to this break from the open seas, and chance to trade our doubloons for luxuries imported from distant lands.

3 PM: The trip was short and uneventful. We arrived early but the harbor-masters were kind enough to let us weigh anchor in slip 522 regardless. We stowed our gear, made ready for the grapple, and after a brief pause to catch the wind in our sails once more, proceeded to the main event.

(Piratey talk ends here.)

While waiting for our room, we had the pleasure of meeting Ryan Hawe, his lovely wife Jen, and their little bundle of sweetness and joy, baby Evelyn. Ryan and Jen are former roommates of ours and it was great to catch up with them and see little Evelyn.

Our room is pleasant in that detached way that the hotel industry has down to a science. I am disappointed at the lack of a microwave in the room. Seems I brought my Orville Redenbacher micro-pop for no reason.

4 PM: Having managed to locate Registration (and a lovely lady who knew where I got my nickname from), I am now a full fledged congoer, and after a brief search and some basic detective work, I manage to locate the panel about how to make your own ebook.

However, after settling down and chatting with some very nice people in the room, I discover that this is not, in fact, the room for the panel ebook making, but the one on the subject of that miracle ingredient of all those awful tasting energy drinks, taurine.

It is at this point that I get my first hint that the program book (ha!) is a pack of lies and only the pocket program guide is to be trusted.

However, by that point I am comfortable and enjoying the company, so I decide what the hell, I will do this panel about taurine instead.

And it was very fun! Turns out taurine is a basic amino acid, but not one of the ones used to code proteins. Instead, it seems to enable other processes to do their jobs. Fun fact: nobody is sure that putting taurine in an energy drink even does anything. It's the caffeine and sugar that does the trick! All those people, drinking awful tasting overpriced drinks when they could go to Starbucks and get the same thing in a much tastier form, and for around the same price.

5 PM: The only programming on right now is the opening ceremonies, and I am really not a "ceremonies" kind of guy, so instead I ascend to the eighth floor and the Hospitality Suite. I enjoy an hour of hanging with my fellow nerds and grazing on the munchies. But only after dutifully dropping $3 in the alien's head. Hospitality runs on donations, after all!

6 PM: Went to a panel about how to make your own audio kit on the cheap. Most of it was way over my head and hence not all that useful for a non-techie like me. I mean, they expected me to learn to solder! Not gonna happen. I would have been better off going to the panel after this one that tells you how to use the darn stuff. Still, I enjoy anything hosted by Dara Korra'ti.

7 PM: Up to our room to regroup with le gang (Joe, Julian, Felicity, and I) and formulate a strategy for getting dinner done. Our usual urge to chat with one another gets in the way, but eventually we formulate a plan and get our rear ends moving.

7:45 PM: We investigate the hotel restaurant and discover that it is both extremely pretentious and extremely expensive. Why do those always coincide? Thank goodness they post a menu outside the restaurant so we didn't have to find all this out after we were already seated. Time for Plan B!

8 PM: Plan B is the local Denny's, a popular hangout with le gang and pretty much the exact opposite of the hotel restaurant in all ways. It's relaxed, unpretentious, reasonable priced, and the people there already know us and give us a warm welcome when we show up. It pays to be not just regulars, but nice regulars.

Also, somewhere along the way, we pick up Chris, AKA Rain-Rat, a local furry whom I had not seen in ages, and our friend Amos, freshly back from a long trip traveling across the USA to fly the BDSM flag everywhere he can.

10 PM: Back to the hotel room to relax with le gang, hang out, snack, and watch TV, which is more or less what we always do on Friday nights. There are room parties going on, but despite how I sometimes come across, I am an introvert, and my social batteries are totally dead. So we just hang out till we get sleepy and then drift off to bed. It's sort of neat to watch television with friends in what is, for the weekend, your bedroom. I wouldn't want to do it all the time, but it's nice for a change to not even have to get up and go to the bedroom when the night's festivities are over.

1:30 AM: Time to sleep! Thank goodness I brought my sleeping pills. Surely this time, unlike my VancouFur experience when I forgot said pills, I will fall asleep easily and sleep soundly!

4 AM: Despite my sleeping pills, it takes this long for me to finally fall asleep. I guess the excitement of the day is still keeping my mind all wired up. Oh well, conventions aren't for sleeping anyway!
